PREFACE.

Notwithstanding the vast importance of the Roman inscriptions in throwing light on every fact and phase of ancient life, it is surprising how little attention they have received up to the present time in the field of linguistics. Though they are the best, and often the only, source of information on the nature and development of the popular Latin idiom, it may be truly said that outside of the domain of phonetics they have as yet received no adequate treatment, as a whole.¹ The reason for this is not far to seek. Scattered about heretofore in numberless collections and periodicals, with no definite arrangement and often without proper discrimination of the true and the false, they have presented the most serious obstacles to comprehensive study. Happily, however, through the generous provision of the Royal Prussian Academy, they have at length been subjected to the searching analysis of the most competent scholars, and are now in greater part, under a careful geographical arrangement and with a complete apparatus criticus, presented to the student in the epoch-making volumes of the Corpus Inscriptionum Latinarum.

My purpose in the following dissertation has been two-fold. First, in the field of lexicography proper.

¹ Such monographs as Guericke, De linguae vulgaris reliquiis apud Petronium et in inscriptionibus parietariis Pompeianis, and Kübler, Die lateinische Sprache auf afrikanischen Inschriften (ALL. VIII p. 161 ff.) deal with the inscr. of certain localities only. Inscriptional forms are cited singly in the volumes of ALL. and other periodicals. I note as a curious fact that Prof. Wölfflin, writing on Vulgärlatein (Philologus XXXIV (1875) p. 137 ff.), speaks of the sources of information, but does not mention inscr. Yet no one knew their linguistic importance better than he.

Our standard Latin dictionaries are far too meagre in their citations of inscriptional words. Hundreds have entirely escaped their notice,¹ and such as find a place in them are generally cited from the obsolete collections of Gruter, Doni, Muratori and others, or at best from the Amplissima Collectio of Orelli-Henzen. Such citations are generally worthless to the modern student, to whom the older works are largely unknown, except by title; and indeed the inscriptions so cited are often likely to prove false or badly read.² In the following lists, therefore, I have endeavored, within the limits of my investigation, to revise and supplement the lexicons. All words, as far as possible, are cited from the Corpus itself; or, in the case of such inscriptions as are not included therein, from the most trustworthy source. The lexicons of Forcellini-De Vit (1858 +), K. E. Georges (7th Ed. 1879-80), and (Harper's) Lewis and Short (1888) have been carefully consulted, and the omission of words has been noted in brackets with the letters F. G. and H respectively. A glance at the lists will show how much may be added from inscriptions; out of a total of about three-thousand substantives and adjectives, 210 do not occur in F, 266 in G, and 389 in H.

Second, and more important, in the field of the popular, as opposed to the classical, Latin. Our knowledge of the Sermo Vulgaris or Plebeius, still unfortunately very imperfect, is to be gained from two different sources and by two classes of specialists; the Latinists occupied directly with the linguistic material that has survived the wreck of the past, and the Romance philologists tracing back the modern language by exact phonetic laws to their origin in the Latin. But though approached from different directions, these investigations are correlative at every point. The historical study of the Romance languages points out unmistakeably the tendencies that are to be sought in the popular Latin speech; and the study of the Sermo Vulgaris in turn gives the clue to the development and differentiation of the Romance languages.

² For instance, aromatarius is cited by Georges from Orelli 114, which is false (= c. xi 426 *).

On the side of the Latin itself, no documents in our possession give such a clear and accurate impression of the Sermo Vulgaris as the inscriptions. The Roman lapidaries wrote nearly as they spoke, and herein lies the source of much of our knowledge of Latin phonetics. But more than that, in word-formation and syntax the writers of the inscriptions used the language of everyday life, not the 'book-Latin' which they had forgotten since their school-days, if indeed they had ever learned to use it in the schools. The language of the inscriptions is in a large degree the spontaneous language of the people, modified, no doubt, by the character of the writer and the purpose to which it is applied, but still the popular language, even when devoted to the technical processes of law, religion, or commerce.

The number of Latin inscriptions that survive either in the original or in accurate copies certainly exceeds 125000. The material thus afforded for the study of word-formation and syntax is very great; and its thorough investigation will need the work of many years and many hands. Where so much is to be done, one must choose a narrow field. I have confined myself, therefore, to the substantives and adjectives of the inscriptions; yet even these, if treated comprehensively, would prove far beyond the limits of a dissertation. Accordingly, I have selected, by terminations, those classes that are most prominent in the Romance languages. Such formations, it may be assumed, were prevalent also in the Latin sermo vulgaris; and the assumption is confirmed by the inscriptions. More than one-sixth of the words are quite unknown to Latin literature. For completeness, as well as for purposes of statistics and comparison, all inscriptional words, even those in classical use, are included in the lists, each in its own class; but the more interesting forms are denoted by larger type; and in the case of rarer words, their further history is shown in the foot-notes. My endeavor has been to render the lists as complete as possible. To read all the inscriptions was no small task, and I am conscious that many words must have been overlooked.

In conclusion I wish to acknowledge my debt to those whose counsel and guidance I have enjoyed; — to Professor Harry Thurston Peck, by whose suggestion my attention was first drawn to this study, and whose advice and assistance have been of the greatest help; — to Professor James C. Egbert, Jr. whose kindly interest has been an inspiration, as his broader knowledge was a never-failing aid; — and to Dr. Frederic Taber Cooper, on whose dissertation, “Word Formation in the Roman Sermo Plebeius”, I have modeled the plan of my own.

New York, October, 1896.

After an absence of two years, occupied in classical studies in Rome, I am at length able to bring to the printer my completed work. In the meantime, new inscriptions have come to light, and further study has brought forth new evidence in the field of Latin word-formation. I have endeavored, in so far as my time allowed, to make the lists complete to the present moment. For omissions and inaccuracies I must ask indulgence; it cannot be hoped that such have failed to escape my notice. To the pressmen and proofreaders, who have worked faithfully with a strange language, I offer my sincerest thanks.

INTRODUCTION.

Since its reduction to a comprehensive system, the study of Latin lexicography has taken two main directions; the one looking to the collection and arrangement of the great mass of linguistic material that has come to us from the Roman world, and the perfection of the Latin lexicon; the other concerning itself specifically with that popular form of Latin which, untrammeled by the restrictions imposed on the literary speech, reflected the daily life of millions of people in every part of the Roman empire, and has survived, under diverse influences and in varied forms, in the Romance languages of Europe.

The existence side by side of two phases of Latin speech has always been recognized; it is attested by numberless statements and implications of the Roman writers.¹ But the exact nature of the popular Latin idiom and its precise relation to the classic language have given rise to much dispute. It is unnecessary here to enter in detail upon the question of the history and differentiation of the Sermo Classicus and the Sermo Vulgaris. The subject has received ample elucidation at the hands of many scholars, and the essential features are carefully summed up by Cooper,² with whose general treatment I am quite in accord. A few supplementary remarks, however, regarding my own understanding and use of the term Sermo Vulgaris will not be out of place.

§. I. The SERMO VULGARIS. A perfectly unmixed and independent dialect is a linguistic impossibility. The language of early Rome, the Prisca Latinitas, was no exception to the rule. It had already received the impress of the races with which it had come in contact; yet it still remained the compact language, or dialect, of a small community, alike spoken and understood by all classes.³

³ Monceaux, I. c. p. 432: et, jusqu'au milieu du III^e siècle avant notre ère, elle [la langue vulgaire] a été la seule langue des Romains.

The early relations with Greek culture and the ultimate conquest of Greece wrought a sudden but far-reaching change in the language of Rome. Visions of a new and higher life appeared before the astonished eyes of a rude people, and the history of the world can show no parallel for the eagerness with which every attainment of Greek genius was sought and engrafted in the life and thought of the Romans. The effect of this change is nowhere more marked than in the domain of literature and language. Roman literature worthy of the name had its origin in Greek thought; its founders were in fact more Greek than Latin. But the rough and unwieldy language was ill adapted to the expression of the higher thoughts and emotions, and its spirit was foreign to the niceties of Greek versification. At the hands of the literary class the prisca Latinitas suffered a gradual and comprehensive modification in conformity with the Greek models. Its declensions and conjugations, already breaking down under the influence of natural development, were rendered uniform and stable; its vocabulary was increased along certain lines where the new culture created new needs, and vastly narrowed along other lines by the elimination of all that savored of the commonplace; its pronunciation was fixed by an arbitrary ius et norma loquendi; and thus, out of the rough but flexible early language of the people, there grew two forms of speech, current at the same time and in the same territory, but quite distinct in spirit and structure.¹

Such was the Sermo Classicus, the language of Roman literature at its best. But while this movement was in progress in the literary circles of society, the Sermo Vulgaris had never lost its vigor among the people. It still remained, in some form, the universal language of the Romans, ignorant and cultured alike; for even the devotees of urbanitas must have adapted their language to the persons with whom they held intercourse in the household, the forum, the shops, or the army.² Though differing widely in its outward aspects according to the surroundings and standard of education of the speaker, (from the rustic speech of the peasant and the slang of the streets to the easy colloquialism of the gentleman), it always presented to the classical speech the essential distinction of spontaneity and unconventionality.¹ The Sermo Vulgaris was but the prisca Latinitas, modified by forces from within, from without, from above, spreading over the world in the wake of the Roman legions, changing gradually in time and place, yet remaining throughout the empire essentially the same, until with the fall of the State and the rise of the nations it appeared again in literature in the Romance languages.²

² Quint. XII 10. 40: sermone quotidiano —, quo cum amicis, coniugibus, liberis, servis loquamur; Gell. I 22. 2: Atque id dicitur non in compitis tantum neque in plebe vulgaria, sed in foro, in comitio, apud tribunalia. Cf. Cic. Fam. XI 21.

Thus there is a sharp line of demarcation between the Sermo Classicus and the Sermo Vulgaris, and the direction of this line is determined by the presence or absence of spontaneity and unconventionality of expression, and not by the culture of the speaker or writer.³ But while the cultured speech was the prerogative of the small literary class and its dependents, the popular language was as broad as the bounds of the empire. It differed not only with locality and social position, but even, in some degree, with the whim of the individual. How, then, in this tangle of dialects can we hope for orderly arrangement? Within the Sermo Vulgaris itself there are no sharply drawn lines of demarcation; for however great the differences may have been, they shade off so imperceptibly the one into the other, that it is almost impossible now to detect them. It is only, therefore, by the adoption of a broad view of the Sermo Vulgaris as opposed to the classic Latin that much can be obtained, at least in the present, from the documents at our disposal.⁴

garis has been to separate from the text all elements that are not strictly classical and label them 'vulgar.' The results have been excellent, but the principle is not exact, for two reasons. First, because this assumes an opposition of the two forms of speech, which certainly did not exist as far as the Sermo Vulgaris is concerned, for opposition implies discrimination, and all the discrimination was on the side of classic Latin. Honor and felicitas were as much a part of the Sermo Vulgaris as caballus, bucca, or manducare. As regards word-formation, almost all that belonged to the Sermo Classicus was also a part of the popular speech, while on the other hand much that was vital in the latter was studiously avoided by the former. Second, while this fact is well understood, the continual attention given to what is essentially unclassical in the popular speech tends to emphasize unduly a single prominent phase. The peculiarities of the Sermo Vulgaris are apt to consist of slang, malformations or the like; yet these are only one of its features, though naturally a prominent one. The result is not only an unconscious confusion of popular Latin with simple vulgarity or indecency and the use of vulgaris in the derived sense of 'vulgar,'¹ but also the assumption of a greater divergence in the use of words than is warranted by the facts. The Sermo Vulgaris is not so much the language of ignorance as the natural language. The grammar and the dictionary, the insistence upon a form and style that are sanctioned by the best writers, may influence, but they cannot control its destiny. It is this assumption that there is an essential difference throughout between the two forms of speech, that they are in fact almost separate languages, it would seem, that leads Sittl to the conclusion that the Sermo Vulgaris, as the Latinists use the term, is a creation of fancy². Understood in its broadest sense, the Sermo Vulgaris is no mere hypothesis; it is not a language at all in the sense of a linguistic unit, but a mass of variations and peculiarities continually shifting and changing in place and time during a period of many centuries.¹

§ 2. LOCAL VARIATIONS IN THE SERMO VULGARIS. It is an a priori statement that admits of no doubt, that the Roman Sermo Vulgaris at any given time must have differed materially in the various provinces of the empire.² It is inconceivable that even the prisca Latinitas could have been absolutely the same throughout the then narrow boundaries of the Republic.³ As each new state was overcome, and the conquerors set themselves the task of latinizing it, there must have resulted a certain contamination in their own speech, as well as a form of Latin among the conquered people that was not exactly the language of the conquerors. When we consider the vast dominions of the empire at the period of its greatest extension, and the fact that a majority of its subjects were not Romans but romanized; when we recall the general poverty and lack of education, and above all the difficulties of intercommunication, we cannot doubt the existence of well established local differences. If the speech of the Roman senator differed in some degree from that of his slaves, how much more must the language of the Italian farmer have differed from that of the semi-Grecian peasant of Africa or the humble descendent of the Pannonian colonist.

Or considered from another point of view; it cannot be assumed that the vital differences of the Romance languages took shape only after the division of the empire.⁴ Notwithstanding the barbarian invasions, these languages are still essentially Latin in structure and lexicon. We are certainly right, therefore, in assuming that their differences were already grounded in the Sermo Vulgaris. There is in fact no well defined line which marks the passage of Latin into Italian and French and Spanish; they are only the Sermo Vulgaris in its present form.¹

This much, then, may be confidently asserted of the Sermo Vulgaris. When we come to examine the material at hand, however, the result is disappointing, and seems at first sight to disprove the assumption entirely. So far from finding clearly marked local differences in the inscriptions, which should certainly be our best authority, it becomes apparent that such differences are to be detected only with the most diligent study, and many have thus been led to doubt their actual existence.² A steady development of the popular speech in the direction of the Romance languages is everywhere observable, but the Gallic inscriptions do not show any mastering tendency to become French rather than Italian, nor those of Lusitania to become Portuguese rather than French. Nor should we really expect to find such marked development at so early a period. Dialectic variations there doubtless were; pronunciation differed more or less, words took on new senses, new words were borrowed or coined, grammatical constructions changed in time and place;

aus einer gemeinsamen ursprache entwickelt haben, als fortsetzung der dialecte der ursprache zu betrachten haben, und kann annehmen, dass ein teil der zwischen ihnen bestehenden unterschiede schon aus der periode ihres continuierlichen zusammenhanges herstammt, Cf. ALL. IX p. 147: Die Anschabung, dass das einheitliche Latein erst in den romanischen Sprachen sich gespalten habe, hat seit Schuchardt keine Begründung mehr; vielmehr gab es nicht nur ein Schriftlatein und ein Vulgärlatein, sondern das letztere selbst zeigt lokale Verschiedenheiten und ist im Laufe der Jahrhunderten ein anderes geworden.

but we have no evidence that an intelligent Roman could not always understand an intelligent Gaul or Spaniard or Latin-speaking African. There is no question of a division of language during any period of the empire.¹

The testimony of the ancient writers regarding local variations in Latin refers mainly to phonetic differences, and it is naturally here that the greatest divergence lay;² nevertheless there is no lack of evidence of distinctions and local peculiarities in the formation and use of words. Herein, however, lies a difficulty arising from the complexity of the subject and the limited and negative character of the evidence. Our knowledge of the popular speech must be based on the written documents, and the Sermo Vulgaris was essentially a spoken language. The slight remains preserved to us are but the visible part of a giant berg whose greater mass is hidden in the ocean of the past. We may draw conclusions as we will; they are all tentative, and subject to complete reversal with the discovery of a new inscription, or the more thorough study of the facts.

The formation of classified lists like those which follow, of words drawn from the inscriptions, will afford abundant material for the further study of word-peculiarities in the various provinces of the empire. We know from scattered passages of the Roman writers that in certain localities strange words were in use, or usual words in strange meanings. In the time of Varro,³ cenaculum was still used in its primary sense of triclinium in some places, as at Lanuvium, at Falerii, at Corduba. The Praenestines⁴ had the word tongitio in the sense of notio, and said *nefrones*⁵ for testiculi, a word that obtained also at Lanuvium in the form nebrundines. The festival struppearia was peculiar to Falerii, and struppus is noted at Tusculum.¹ A peasant of Anagnia informed Marcus Aurelius² that sarmentum was an old Hernican word (Latinized, of course) still in use there to signify the skin of the victim which the flamen wore on his apex when entering the town. These and other words are cited as provincialisms in Italy. In Gaul, too, we are told that legaria was used for legumina,³ and tripetia for sella rusticana.⁴ It would be interesting to turn to the inscriptions and find direct evidence in word-forms of the early differentiation of the romance languages. If flere disappeared and gave place to plangere (piangere) in Italy and to plorare (pleurer) in Gaul; if malum, casa survived in the peninsula (mela—but cf. pomidoro—casa) and pomum, mansio in the Gallic provinces (pomme, maison), it would indeed be gratifying to see the beginning of the tendency in the inscriptions of the respective countries; but we are given no such good fortune.⁵ Paramus, indeed, appears in a Spanish inscription,⁶ and has survived only in Span. paramo; but such instances are rare.

It will not be out of place to cite from inscriptions a few words which seem to have been of local or provincial use, at least in their origin. If a word appears in but a single inscription, it offers no basis for a theory; if it is found several times in one locality, and nowhere else, we may assume that it was a local word; if further it appears in literature first in a writer whose origin connects him with that territory, the assumption is strengthened; and if later we find it in use by various authors, it must be remembered that a provincial neologism, once admitted into literature, may lose its local character and become common property.

Ampliatio appears to be an African formation;⁷ it occurs in an inscription of the Proconsular Province and in Tertullian. Congressio = ‘attack’ is a favorite word of Justinus, to whom Wölfflin⁸ assigns an African origin; we find it in this sense also in an inscription of Lambaeis. Dispunctor (Mauretania—Tert.), salentiosus (Numidia—Apul.), desperatio = ‘violent acts’ (Mauretania — Apul.), pollicitator (Thamugadi — Tert.), collegiarius (Cirta — Tert.) are a few of the very many coincidences that may be adduced as cumulative evidence of the special use of words in Africa.¹ The genius of Roman Africa seems to have lent itself, even more than that of the other provinces, to the greatest freedom in word-formation to meet every passing need.

Other probable local peculiarities may be noted elsewhere. Cognatio=collegium is found only at Salona in Dalmatia, culminalis and culminaris only in Pannonia and Noricum, cretarius north of the Alps. In North Italy we have collegiatus (=the African collegiarius) at Arilica and Brixia;² parcimonium ‘savings’ at Pola, Cremona, Brixia; propinatio (funebris) at Brixia and Comum; repunctor at Placentia and Mediolanum. Similarly subventor is only found in Campania, at Capua, Nola and Puteoli. Laesio, laesura (animi) is a Gallic usage, and limarius is found only at Narbo, while solutarius seems to be confined to Lusitania. The geographical distribution of words in inscriptions deserves an exhaustive study.

A discussion of the general characteristics of the inscriptional language of Italy, Africa, Spain and Gaul would be beyond the limits of the present study, which is confined to certain classes of terminations. A critical examination of the inscriptions, however, will show that the sermo vulgaris of Italy, and especially of Rome, was a remarkable complex of influences from every quarter, which, under the Empire, with the constant influx of people from all parts of the world, lost the power of discrimination, and admitted provincialisms and Greek words, hybrid and self-explaining compounds at will. Rome, as the focus of ancient life, can hardly be said to have had a characteristic sermo vulgaris of its own; but between north and south Italy one may detect here and there traces of divergences which had come down from older times or had grown up under conditions of isolation. The language of north Italy under the Empire approaches rather that of Gaul,³ that of south Italy shows a closer connection with Africa.¹ Gallic Latin was characterized by a certain dignity and rhetorical poise, a fulness and elegance of diction,² as became a land of rhetors and grammarians. To a certain extent this is visible in the pre-Christian inscriptions of Gaul and north Italy, from which the unrestrained license in form and syntax, so characteristic of those of Rome, south Italy and Africa, is reasonably absent.

The language of south Italy, and most notably of Campania and Apulia, is impregnated with Greek,³ as is the Campanian speech of Petronius' characters. It shares with Africa the readiness to form compounds with con — (— 'fellow —'), due to the influence of the Greek συν —⁴, as condecurio (Lucania and Africa), concurialis (Beneventum and Theveste, Numidia); and is notably fond of the ablative in —u (ancentu Venafrum, apparatu Abella, Cumae, delegatu Pompeii, etc.), and of denominatives in —tus,⁵ also frequent in Africa.

The inscriptional language of Africa has received special treatment by Kübler.⁶ It is characterized by a love of abstract expressions, a fondness for long words, and a rhetorical fulness of diction.⁷ The tumor Africus is visible as well in the inscriptions of Africa as in its literature. The epitaphs far surpass those of the other provinces in strained and overloaded expressions. c. Of the terminations to which I have devoted the following pages, — alis, — torius (— torium), — arius (— arium) and — icius are particularly frequent in Africa, and — tio is extensively used there, notably in unusual senses.¹ Adjectives in — osus are few in number, but the fondness for the termination so often noted in the writers of African Latinity,² is amply shown by the numerous cognomina that appear in inscriptions,³ Aelia Aeliosa (c. VIII 9151). Plotia Flaviosa (3971), Julia Maximosa (4276), etc. Cognomina in — ica also are a well-known feature of African inscriptions, and support the connection that has often been claimed for African and Spanish Latin,⁴ for the termination — ico is diminutive in Spanish;⁵ in connection with which it may be noted that solamina — ‘provisions’ is found only at Hispalis (c. II 1180) and at Maktar (VIII 619).

The Spanish inscriptions, beyond a strong Iberian element observable mostly in proper names, offer little for the study of local word-formation.

§ 3. THE INSCRIPTIONS. The mass of inscriptions may be classed as (a) sepulchal, (b) dedicatory and honorary, (c) of public works, (d) ‘documenta,’ (e) smaller objects, ‘instrumentum domesticum,’ as tiles, lamps, stamps, rings, tesserae, lead-pipes etc., (f) ephemeral inscriptions, i. e. graffiti, dipinti, wax tablets and the like. By far the greater number is of the sepulchal class, and this is fortunate for the present study, for the epitaphs bring us into the closest touch with the popular life and language of the day. Here more than elsewhere (except in the graffiti, which, however, show rather a vulgarity of sentiment than of language), we find the nearest approach to the sermo vulgaris, for here the people of all classes give voice to their feelings of affection and pride and sorrow with all the simple verbiage at their command,¹ or break forth into verse, poor doubtless, as poetry, but the more valuable linguistically as it is spontaneous and unstudied. The sepulchral inscriptions add the largest proportion of new words to our lexicons, and show how readily new meanings were attached to words in the popular speech, and how unrestrained it was in the use of synonyms.²

The dedicatory and honorary inscriptions, on the other hand, afford comparatively little that is new;³ titles of gods and genii (culminaris, solutorius, territor, tribunicialis), and of legions (equitata, fulminata), and here and there a word explanatory of the condition or attitude of the dedicatory, comprise the sum of our gains from this source. The formulaic inscriptions of public works, too, are almost barren of interest.

In the ‘documenta,’ again, we have a fertile source of the inscriptional vocabulary. Their value is very relative, according to the purpose to which they were applied and the subject of which they treat, from the carefully worded Res Gestae of Augustus to the Edict of Diocletian de pretiis rerum venalium, prolific of rare and new words. In the laws and plebiscites that have been preserved on stone and bronze, one could not expect to find traces of plebeian pronunciation and syntax, but one may certainly look here for unclassical word-forms, and in fact the search would not be vain. Quintilian I 6. 17 writes: ‘moleste diligentibus permittamus et tribunale dicere.’ The classical speaker or writer would use tribunal, and the vulgar by-form would be elsewhere unknown, did it not appear in the Lex Iulia Municipalis of B. C. 45.⁴ Provincial and municipal regulations especially afford interesting material; notably the Lex Metalli Vi- pascensis of Spain¹ and the building-ordinance of Puteoli.² Even the acta of the Arval Brothers will be frequently cited for new forms in the lists that follow. It may be stated without hesitation that of all the 'documenta' preserved, the privilegia veteranorum alone, as a class, do not merit study for purposes of lexicography.

The 'instrumentum domesticum' as a whole is unfruitful. The objects are generally small, and the inscription is often limited to the maker's name. From a vase from Gaul³ we have the new word cervesarius, and the bone tesserae afford some ill-natured $\alpha\pi\alpha\varsigma \epsilon\sigma\eta\mu\acute{\epsilon}\nu\alpha$. The oculists', stamps in particular are rich in medical terms, especially names of salves and lotions, and eye-diseases in —tio, —tudo, —itia, —ities.

Finally of the graffiti it is unnecessary to speak; their vulgar character is well known, and their value in the study of popular word-formation is no less than in that of phonetics. The dipinti, largely Pompeian election-recommendations, are of secondary interest, and the auction-tablets of Caecilius Jucundus preserve but a limited number of new words, while the wax tablets of Dacia are almost devoid of importance.

§ 4. SUBSTANTIVES AND ADJECTIVES IN INSCRIPTIONS. A brief consideration of the use of substantives and adjectives in inscriptions is all that is here possible. If there is one fact in particular that the study of inscriptional lexicography teaches, it is that we should not assume that a word which appears first in a given author is the creation of his fancy. In the great majority of cases, he has certainly admitted it to his writings only as he finds it in use in the colloquial speech of those about him; has raised it, that is, from the sermo vulgaris to the standing and dignity of a literary word. In the following lists, a very large number of words will be found in inscriptions dating long before their first appearance in literature.⁴ On the other hand, many an archaic word lived on in the popular speech though excluded from the classic diction. A case in point would be dolentia = dolor, which is cited by Gellius⁵ from Laevius as

'nove aut insigniter dictum,' and though unknown afterwards in the whole range of literature, appears again, several centuries later, in a Christian epitaph of Aquileia.¹

The inscriptions show conclusively that the sermo vulgaris availed itself at all periods of certain self-explanatory terminations, notably -alis, -aris, -arius, -atus, -icius, -tio, -tor, -trix, to form any word at will. -arius in particular may be called par excellence the inscriptional suffix; its formations are apparently quite unlimited, and every year brings to light a new inscriptional form. The preponderance of certain suffixes and the comparative absence of others (as -ax, -ela, -etum, -or) is explained by the character of the inscriptions themselves.

The principle of discrimination and elimination being entirely absent from the sermo vulgaris, there is no limit to the formation, side by side as fancy wills, of synonyms by the simple addition of various suffixes to the same stem. The present participle had a much more extended use in the popular than in the classic language; and fond as the Roman was of words in -tor and -arius, there was abundant place in his broad vocabulary for the participial substitutes [barbaricans? = barbararius,] cognoscens = cognitor, commeans = mercator, gladians = gladiarius or gladiator, negotians = negotiator, provocans = provocator, vians = viator.² The grammarian Charisius³ says: 'collectaneus dici debet. Nam collectus nemo dicit.' In the inscriptions both forms occur,⁴ with a possible preference for the censured one. The numerous parallel forms for 'niece,' neptis, nepos (c. XII 344), nepotia (c. III 2599, 2690, 2756, 2798, 6155, etc.), nepota (c. III 3173), neptia (c. III 3582), nepotula, nepotilla, nepticula,⁵ etc. show the easy indifference of the popular language in the use of words.

Again, the euphemisms for 'death' and 'tomb' are very ¹ c. v 1686. This particular word may, of course, have been a re-formation; but it illustrates the principle.

² In this connection, the substitution of the simple verb for the derived substantive with ESSE should be noted: CENTURIAM REGUIT (i. e. REXIT) = CENTURIO FUIT, c. V. 923; COLUIT = CULTOR FUIT, X 1877, 1918; CUCURRIT = CURSOR FUIT, VI 9317; DISPENSARE = DISPENSATOR ESSE, VI 9327, 9348; DISPENSAVIT = *D. numerous. The pagan Roman was generally content with the simple word mors. Factus is used twice in this sense, once as pure slang: ¹ iste mulus me ad factum dabit ‘that mule will do me up,’ and once in an iambic senarius: ² noli dolere, mater, factui meo; and other more logical expressions (eventum, finitio fati) may be noted; but it is in Christian epitaphs that the greatest divergence appears: dormitio, occasus, recessio, redditio, requietio, transitus, as for mortuus est we have migravit de hac luce, quievit or requievit, recessit, reddidit or tult annos, transiit, vixit in saeculo or saeculares annos, vixit in diem aetatis suae (not moris suae, which had an unpleasant sound). Similarly, as a substitution for sepulcrum I may note mansio, domus or sedes aeterna or aeternalis or perpetua, domus romula, memoria or memoriola.

The poetical element is very strong in the Latin sermo vulgaris, as in the simple speech of all peoples, and shows itself everywhere in the inscriptions, notably in the terms of relationship and wherever a sentiment of affection is manifested. Genitores = *parentes*³ (Ital. genitor), parens = pater, ⁴ iugalis = maritus,⁵ consors (once *consortio*⁶) = *coniux, incrementum*⁷ = *filius, filia, nati*⁸ or *pignera*⁹ = filii, sarcogena = *filia*¹⁰ etc. We find also termen for annus,¹¹ and frequently lumina for oculi.

Characteristic also of the popular Latin is the free use of compounds. Prepositional compounds often have no further force than the simple words (cf. ac-commodator, e-ministratio). The use of con-=‘fellow-’ is especially frequent (commilito, concibo, condecurio, contiro, conservus), here also often without added meaning (concurialis, congenitalis.¹²) Compounds in —fer, -ger, -genus, -fex, -ficus are particularly numerous,¹³ and self-explaining compounds abound everywhere (cf. altifrons, c. II 2660, bene-suadus X 1365, florisapus VIII 212, lanifricarius IV 1190, piscicapus IV 826, all inscriptive words.) To the popular formative genius we may assign such contracted compounds as *domiseda*¹ = quae domi sedet, *domnaedius*² = dominus aedium, *domnifunda*³ = domina fundi, *domnipraedia*⁴ = domina praedii, *mundator*⁵ = muneris dator. This compounding tendency took a ludicrous direction in the later period, with the breaking down of syntax, when such formulas as vir bonae memoriae and se vivo fecit entirely lost their grammatical relation and gave rise to the declined adjectives bonememorius or *benememorius*⁶ and se-vivus. And to this same period of linguistic decay we owe the shifting of form seen in concordius for concors,⁷ innox for innocens,⁸ peleger for peregrinus,⁹ and the like.

It remains only to mention the popular fondness for diminutives, with or without a diminutive sense, and the tendency of certain terminations to assume a diminutive force. This is seen for—*icius*¹⁰ in such words as nepoticia, vernacius; while three diminutives in—inus,—ina are cited hereafter.¹¹ The classical word parietinae already has a sense of diminution. The glosses further prove that the suffix—ina was a recognized diminutive termination in the sermo vulgaris.¹²

CLASSIFIED LISTS.

A. ABSTRACT SUBSTANTIVES.

It has often been observed¹ that while the classic Latin was restricted in its use of abstract terms, the Sermo Vulgaris offered a marked contrast in the freedom with which they were employed. In this respect the testimony of the inscr. supports the evidence of literature. There is noticeable throughout a tendency to express abstract ideas in abstract terms; less forcible, perhaps, in the early period, when the inscr. in general are more concise and formulaic, but becoming dominant under the empire. This tendency is especially notable in the case of verbal derivatives in -tio, - sio, but is shared also by the substantives in -tus -tas and others, it is due in part to a fondness for long words and well-rounded clauses, in part also to a desire for more vivid expression. Accordingly the simple classical construction of subst. + adj. or part. gives place largely to groups of substantives. Cf. ob peregrinationis expeditionem = ob peregrinationem expeditam, post alarem exercitationem = post alam exercitatam, ex iniquitatibus mensurarum et ponder(un)m = ex iniquis mensuris et ponderibus, ad emptionem possessionis, prope diem consummationis primi pili = prope diem primi pili consummati etc. The gerundive construction sinks to a subordinate position; ad tuitionem statuae is preferred to ad statuam tuendam. The case absolute wavers between the abl., acc., and nom., and ultimately disappears in its original form; in consulatu (eorum) arises beside (iis) consulibus. The popular taste for quaint and expressive circumlocutions also helped to extend the use of abstracts. Cf. debitum naturae persolvit = obiit, moratus est in dispensatione = dispensator fuit, hic iacet germanitas fratris et sororis = germani.

The use of abstracts in a concrete sense is not unknown to classic Latin, but was certainly most prevalent in the popular speech,¹ and is therefore naturally prominent in inscr. Cf. ambulatio = locus ambulationis, arcuatura = arcus, armatura = miles, circuitus = via in circulo, clusura = fibula, gestatio = locus gestationis, lavatio = locus vel supellex lavationis, pedatura = spatium pedibus mensum, repositio = repositorium etc.

The most important classes of abstract substantives in the inscr. will be found grouped in the following division. Those in -or have been omitted; the 42 forms that occur in inscr. are all (with exception of nigror C. VI 30258) of general occurrence, and show nothing new or valuable. As a formative suffix, -or lost its importance at the close of the archaic period.² The inscr. also offer nothing of interest in -ela. Cautela, loquela, querela, (querella, quaerela, quaerella), and tutela are frequent in inscr. as elsewhere; and candela is seen in the derivatives *candelabrum*³ and candelabrus.⁴ It has been asserted that -ela was a popular suffix in the Sermo Vulgaris;⁵ its unimportant remains, however, in the Romance languages,⁶ and the complete absence of late formations in inscr.,⁷ would tend to disprove the supposition. The same is substantially true of the suffix -do (-ido -edo). Its importance in the Sermo Vulgaris was mainly confined to the rustic vocabulary, which is but slightly represented in inscr. Cupido, crepido, formido, libido are frequent; formido = 'scarecrow' (Test. Basil., Wilm, Ex. 315, Bruns p. 278, II l. 24) is worthy of note.

§ I. -T-IO, -S-IO — Of all the abstract substantives in Latin,

1. Stoltz and Schmalz, Lat. Gramm., in Müllers Handb. II p. 367: Schon die alte Sprache hat abstr. in konkrem Sinne verwendet., and p. 368: Es scheint, dass die Sprache der Jäger, Landleute, Soldaten, Advokaten, hier manches eigenthümliche hatten, was allmählich sich Eingang in die Schriftsprache zu verschaffen wusste those in -tio, -sio are the most numerous in all grades and at all periods of the language. Paucker¹ estimates the number used by the older writers at somewhat over 1450, of which 862 are found in Cicero and Caesar, and states that this number was more than doubled in post-classical literature. The use of these abstracts extended to every department of life and thought; philosophy, law, medicine, the public service, commerce, agriculture, and the homely processes of daily life, all shared them alike, and did not hesitate to employ at will so useful a suffix, whose neologisms bore their meaning on their face.

7. The inscr. have only nitor, not nitela (Apul., Solin.); peccatum, delictum etc., not peccatela (Tert.), conductio, not conductela (Interpr. ad Cod. Theod.), etc.

The inscr. abound in these words. The following list contains 340 forms. As a whole, the list is not a remarkable one; less than 5% of the words are confined to inscr., and of these the greater part are ἀπαξεὶς εἰρηνένα. About 25 show a meaning unknown to literature, and 10 seem to occur but once outside of inscr. Legal terms are especially numerous; those of agriculture, in the terminology of which these forms held a prominent place,² are notably absent.³ The frequent use of these abstracts in a concrete sense has been mentioned above; no less than 22 will be found below. Such usage in military language deserves special notice; cf. reliquatio = 'body of troops left behind', vexillatio = 'body of vexillarii.' The popular character of the suffix is shown also by its frequent appearance in the Pompeian graffiti (cf. destillatio, mixio), and by its not infrequent tautological use (cf. administrationem administravit, c. X 4724; pensiones pensitasse, c. XI 266, etc.).

§ 2. -T-US, -S-V-S. — Formed from the same verbal stems as the substantives in -tio, -sio, those in -tus, -sus, early lost the distinction of meaning which had given them a definite individuality. Already in classic Latin the two suffixes occupied largely the same ground¹, and thereafter their history is mainly one of relative use. A large number of doublets arose, of identical meaning, concurrō concursus, lusio lusus, motio motus, ornatio ornatus, etc., leaving a free choice to the writers in accordance with the spirit of their language. In view of this fact, which renders a comparison of the relative use of the forms singularly easy, it would seem that the position occupied by the suffix -tus, -sus would not be difficult to determine; yet the question has given rise to some difference of opinion. Schulze² claimed for it a much more general use in the Sermo Vulgaris than in classic Latin. Its literary history, as shown by the investigations of Paucker,³ Slaughter⁴ and others, has been summed up by Cooper,⁵ who concludes, on the contrary, that "it is only plebeian to the extent that the sermo vulgaris employed all classes of abstracts more freely than the classic language." According to the investigations above mentioned, the ratio of usage where the language offers a choice of forms is, -tio: -tus, Plautus 3:2, Cicero 2:3, silver Latin (approximately) 1:3; while in late Latin -tus again sinks to a subordinate position.

But this comparison is complicated by the fact that the substantives in -tus are often confined to special cases, while the missing cases are supplied by forms in -tio. The evidence of inscr. will perhaps throw some light on the question. In the first place, the number of substantives in -tio in the whole body of Latinity is more than three times as great as the number of those in -tus.⁶ The inscr., however, show 340 in -tio, and 175 or more than half as many in -tus. As the inscr. in general lie nearer than the literature to the Sermo Vulgaris, this fact by itself would argue for Schulze's contention. Furthermore, with half the number of words, the inscr., show almost as many non-literary forms in -tus as in -tio. It is quite safe to assume, therefore, that the former was an active and favorite suffix in the popular speech.

As regards the distribution of the cases in inscr., the following facts are worthy of note. The abl. is par excellence the most usual with these substantives. Of the 175 words in the following list- 96 are found in the abl., of which 46, or about one-fourth of the whole number, occur only in this case. It is here that the popular character of the suffix is best shown. The origin of this prominence given to the abl. lies doubtless in the analogous 2nd supine.¹ Cf. Aesculapio dictu et factu Isochrysus (dedicavit). It would seem that the popular language assumed the right of forming such ablatives at will, and in most instances we may suppose that the other cases never actually existed. In this way arose the numerous abl. in -u for -o many of which are inscriptional $\ddot{\alpha}\pi\alpha\xi\ \varepsilon\iota\pi$; edictu, meritu, postulatu, praeceptu, beside the more usual and fully declined edictum, meritum etc. The former, I think, are not to be ascribed to phonetic change, but are direct transfers on the analogy of similar forms.² If the objection be raised³ that these forms do not appear in the Romance languages (except Roumanian⁴), it is sufficient to recall the fact that with the collapse of declension in the spoken Latin, all fourth-declension forms tended to pass over to the second. Indeed the later inscr. show a constant increase of formulas like ex iusso, ex viso, beside iussu, visu.

The other cases occur much less often in the list. Acc. sing. leads with 44 cited forms; gen. sing. has 23, mostly of denom. subst. in -atus; nom. sing. follows with 22. The other cases are rarer; acc. plur. 19, abl. plur. 15, dat. sing. (so frequent in Apul. and Tert.⁵) only 6, nom. and gen. plur. 4 each. The dat. plur. does not occur.

² A similar transfer by Cicero (Verr. II 2. 78) is discussed by Gell. XIII 21. 16 (H): Itidem in secunda [sc. in Verrem], simili usus modulamine: 'manifesto peccatu' inquit non 'peccato.' That Gell. treated this as a phonetic change ('crassius iam vetustiusque', ''modulamine'') has no bearing on the point. Cic. may have chosen this special form for phonetic or euphonic reasons, but he certainly did not coin a 2nd decl. neut. abl. in —v.

³ Cooper, l. c.

⁵ Cooper, p. 19 citing Koziol, Stil Apul. p. 267 sq., and Schmidt, Tert. I p. 14.

It remains to notice the denominative forms, which are not separated from the verbals in the following list. These are certainly to be ascribed mainly to the Sermo vulgaris. Only a few find their way into literature; — not more than fifty or sixty at most, confined principally to the later writers. The inscr. have no less than 31, of which 7 do not occur elsewhere. They belong to the language (a) of public life (biselliatus, iuridicatus, praesidatus etc), notably in provincial towns (decurionatus, duumviratus etc.); (b) of religion, pagan or Christian, (episcopatus, flaminatus, seviratus, etc.); (c) of the army (centurionatus); and (d) of communal and private life (bimatus, condiscipulatus, incolatus, patronatus, pupillatus, trimatus).

§ 3. -T-URA, -S-URA. This small but interesting class of substantives has been rightly assigned especially to the Sermo Vulgaris. The investigations of Paucker³, Schmilinsky⁴, Stuenkel⁵, and others, as summed up in brief by Schulze⁶, and further elaborated by Cooper⁷, leave no doubt of the fact that by far the greater number of such words appear in writers of inferior Latinity, the early comedians, the rustic writers, specialists like Vitruvius and Pliny, and the Church fathers. The large proportion of $\alpha\pi\alpha\xi\varsigma\varsigma\varsigma$. and rare forms is further evidence of their prevalence in the popular, as contrasted with the literary, language. And lastly, their prominent place as inherited words in all the Romance languages fully attests their undiminished vitality.

Further testimony, if any be needed, is afforded by the inscr. The list below includes 47 words. If we accept, for purposes of general estimate, Paucker's¹ total of 282 forms with this suffix, we have in the inscr. almost 17 % of the whole number,—a large proportion as the comparison of other lists will show. Of these 47 words, 9, or about 19 %, are $\alpha\pi\alpha\xi\varsigma\varsigma\varsigma$; and as they all represent familiar relations, acts, and objects of public or private life, they are clearly only the residuum of a large number of similar words that found no place in literature. It is worthy of note that the inscr. here serve to correct the deductions drawn from the literary vocabulary. "In later Latin," says Cooper l. c., "when formations in -TIO became general, those in -TURA failed to maintain themselves in opposition, and the new formations are proportionately few." Yet many of the rare inscriptional forms belong to this later period. The famous Edict of Diocletian—which, treating as it does of the details of commerce, of food and clothing and wages, is a prolific source of the popular terminology of the time,—has no less than 6 $\alpha\pi\alpha\xi\varsigma\varsigma\varsigma$. in -TURA, -SURA.

In classic Latin of the best period, these substantives were sacrificed for those in -TIO. The Sermo Vulgaris on the contrary, replete with synonyms of every sort, found room for all possible forms, and governed only by the whim of the moment, used CALCULATIO or CALCULATURA, CURATIO or CURATURA, LAESIO or LAESURA, MUNITIO or MUNITURA as fancy dictated. With like freedom, the abstract force of the suffix was changed to the concrete², or both abstract and concrete senses flourished side by side. Cf. CAESURA 'block of rough stone,' CLUSURA 'clasp of necklace,' VECTURA 'passage money,' VESTITURA 'ornament,' PEDATURA 'measuring by feet' (Gromat. Vet.) and 'plot of ground' (inscr.).

§. 4. -TAS. As the abstracts -tio, -tus, -tura stand together as verbal derivatives, often of identical meaning, so those in -tas and -tudo form a second group, closely associated as adjectival derivatives. (Sanctitas, sanctitudo). The two groups, as they appear in inscr., are therefore brought together in the lists. Of the subst. in -tas, the inscr. offer very little information regarding the use of the suffix in the Sermo Vulgaris. No class of words was so generally in vogue in all grades and periods of the language³.

The number of words in the following list is 139, about 15 $\frac{1}{2}$ % of Paucker’s estimated total⁴. A large number are in classical use; and on the other hand, the absense of those formations which, on other grounds, are classed as popular (-ositas, -iditas, -bilitas), is very noticeable. There are only two new forms, both ἀναξ εἰρ. (one doubtful). This is to be attributed doubtless to the restricted character of the inscriptional language, which, while bringing prominently forward the popular use of certain suffixes, suppresses the evidence of others.

In one respect, however, the inscr. afford positive information; viz. regarding the popular fondness for the termination -alis, (See infra, § 32), which extends also to its derivatives in -tas, (aequalitas, extemporalitas, hospitalitas, inaequalitas). The functions of municipal dignitaries are expressed in this form, which seldom finds its way into the literary language. (cf. augustalitas, ceritalitas, quinquennalitas).

In view of the commonplace character of many of the words in the following list, completeness of citation has not been attempted.

§ 5. —TUDO. The evidence of literature shows that the substantives in —TUDO belong especially to the early period, and to the archaists and later writers of a careless style.² Their prevalence in the Sermo Vulgaris is attested by their preservation in the Romance Languages,³ in which (Ital. and Span.) the suffix never lost its formative vitality. (Cf. schiavitudine, esclavitud).

³ Diez, Gram. p. 651.

The language of the inscr., however, uses these substantives but little. Their period of greatest fertility, as has been said, was the pre-classical age; and the inscr. of this time are few in number and very formulaic in character. The 19 forms that follow are drawn almost without exception from inscr. of the empire, and are all of frequent occurrence in literature. For the post-classical literary forms, the inscr. show generally a preference for —tas, —itia, —or. Cf. inscr. gravitas, scabritia, nigror, acerbitas. tristitia = Vitruv. etc. gravitudo; Petr. scabitudo, Marc. Emp., Plin., Val. scabritudo; Pliny, Aug. nigritudo; Gell. acerbitudo; Apul., Sidon. tristitudo. Other rare words, as albitudo, amaritudo, aritudo, crispitudo, ineptitudo, salsitudo etc., occur in inscr. neither in these nor synonymous forms; but the idea is expressed, if at all, by periphrases with the simple adjective, albus, amarus, aridus, etc. Evidence, therefore, whether positive or negative, of the prevalence of this suffix in the Sermo Vulgaris is not to be sought in inscr.

§ 6. -NT-IA, -NT-IUM. As with substantives in -TUDO, the inscr. have little to show regarding the suffix -NTIA. Paucker¹ has estimated 342 forms in -NTIA, — 139 in the early writers (of which slightly more than half in Cic. and Caes.), 21 in silver Latin, the rest in the later authors, notably Apul., Gell., Tert.² The suffix seems therefore to have been prevalent in the Sermo Vulgaris,³ particularly as it has left a numerous progeny in the Romance languages, (Ital. -nza, -nzia; Span. -nza, -ncia; Port. -nça; Prov. -nsa; Fr. -nce; Wal. -intze.). The inscr. have 53 forms, about 15 1/2 % of the whole, drawn mainly from sep. and dedic. inscr., the greater number of which are of frequent and classical occurrence in literature. Only two new forms appear, conservantia, pervigilantia, both ἀποξειρόπ. The picturesque compounds which make their appearance not seldom in literature, — stultiloquentia Plaut., gravevolentia Pliny, maledicentia Gell., aequiparantia Tert., suavifragrantia Aug., etc. — were often, perhaps, actual coinages of the writers in whom they appear. They are entirely absent from the inscr., which have only the well-known derivatives of velle and facere, benevolentia, honorificentia, magnificentia, munificentia.

The sister-suffix -NTIUM, which is of extremely rare occurrence, appears in inscr., as in classical Latin, only in the word silentium.

§ 7. -ITIA,-ITIES. The number of these substantives in Latin is small. Cooper ¹ has counted 77, 40 in-itia, 37 in-ities ². Of those in-itia, the inscr. have 22 literary ³ forms, and add one, Aacetia=Aequitia=Aequitas; of the 37 in-ities, 4 appear in inscr., which give also the new form milities. ⁴ The occurrence of these suffixes in literature tends to show that -itia was the more classical and general, while -ties was prevalent in the early and post-classical periods. 14 of the 22 inscriptional forms in -itia are found in Cic. and Caes.; others, like latitia, longitia=latitudo, longitudo were later formations, drawn, I think, from the popular speech, in which pairs of words lived freely side by side. As the literary activity of the suffix ceased after the silver period, ⁵ whereas it reappears with renewed vigor in the Romance languages (both in inherited and new formations; cf. franchezza, franqueza, franchise) ⁶, there can be little doubt of its persistence in the Sermo Vulgaris ⁷.

The use of the suffix -ties, on the other hand, seems to have belonged especially to the earlier period. Avarities is cited from two inscr. of the republic, avaritia only under the empire; canities appears only in the Pompeian graffiti; milities in an inscr. of the early 1st century. Yet the suffix never lost its place in the language, for blandities (Apul., Aug.) is found in imperial inscr., and planities (class.) in one of the 4th century, beside planitia in another of much earlier date.

§ 8. -MONIUM, -MONIA. The unclassical character of these substantives has been recognized by all scholars.¹ They form but a small class, less than three dozen in all, about $\frac{1}{3}$ in -monia, $\frac{2}{3}$ in monium (literature, glosses, inscr. inclusive). Of the bare dozen in -monia, Cic. has 7, which Cooper², in view of their rarity, assigns to the influence of the sermo quotidianus. Of double the number in -monium, he uses only 4, matrimonium, patrimonium, testimonium, vadimonium, the universal employment of which, as Cooper l. c. rightly points out, is due 'to cumbersome legal terminology'. It rests without doubt, therefore, that -monium belongs distinctively to the popular speech³.

The inscr. have 13 forms, of which only 3 are in -monia, all Ciceronian. Parcimonium and parsimonium are quite new, regimonium appears elsewhere only in much later times, and caerimonium only in a gloss.

B. CONCRETE SUBSTANTIVES.

The nature of the inscr. is more favorable to the admission of concrete than of abstract substantives. While the sep. and hon. inscr. are full of the characterization of qualities human and divine, and the documenta, in their greater length, reveal the frequent employment of abstracts, still the inscr. as a whole treat more of persons and things, of vocations and rank, of articles of commerce and daily use. The derived concrete substantives fall into two main classes; substantives as such, and adjectives used as substantives. The former class alone is treated in this section; the others are reserved for discussion under the adjectives with which they belong.

Most numerous among the substantives of the class here considered are the nomina personalia in -o(-onis)—tor and—trix, and the nouns in -men, -mentum,—bulum,—culum, and -ina. Other inscriptional forms less prominent than these have been noticed in the introduction supra.

§ 9 -O(-ONIS). These substantives have been so fully treated by Fisch¹ that it would be unnecessary to include them here, were it not deemed advisable to bring together the inscriptional forms in a single list. No class of words in Latin is so peculiarly characteristic of the Sermo Vulgaris.² The inscr., out of about 45 forms, have 11 that appear nowhere else.³ These inscriptional forms, in respect to their meaning, fall into four classes; (1) titles of religion and civic government, curio, decurio, epulo etc., (2) military terms, centurio, commilito, optio, polio etc., (3) designations of trades and occupations, caupo, cerdo, fullo, histrio, lanio, etc., and (4) popular expressions and terms of abuse, bucco, cunnio, nutricia, paedico, socerio etc. The fairest inference is that the suffix was general in the pre-classic period; that its frequent application in malam partem led to its expulsion from the classic speech, except in the case of such common words as deserved to maintain their place either by the ancient respectability of their use (centurio, decurio), by the humble station denoted (caupo, mulio), or by the contempt implied (latro, leno, spado); and that its vigor remained unimpaired in all forms of the popular language.

The extensive use of the suffix in terms of abuse is seen in the graffiti of Pompeii and in the bone tesserae, which, in their spirit, are somewhat analogous to the American comic 'valentine'. Cf. infra ardalio, bucco, cunnio, paedico, spado, vapio. Yet this application did not prevent the popular development of the suffix in other directions. It formed even terms of affection, akin to the diminutives, as nutricia, socerio, vernio, and we find it in formal titles of local guilds, as the concibones of Mauretania and the socii nitiones of the Proconsular Province.

§ 10.—T-OR,—S-OR. A general estimate of these nomina agentis is furnished by Paucker,¹ who, however, unfortunately for our purpose, has included the feminines in—trix without distinction. According to this estimate, the total number is 2294, which might be largely increased, but will serve for purposes of comparison. Cic. and Caes. employ 340 out of 779 in the older writers,² while 1515 appear in literature only after the time of Hadrian.³ It is evident, therefore, that these forms were numerous enough in early Latin, and sufficiently useful to receive the sanction of classical writers, although necessarily within somewhat narrow limits; and that in later times they were introduced into literature wholly without restraint.⁴

The inscr. well show the popular character of the two suffixes. The list below, together with that following (§ 11) have 406 forms, or almost 18% of Paucker's total; and no less than 63, almost 16% of the inscriptional forms, are not to be found in the whole range of literature, while 42 others appear but in a single author each. Those in—tor,—sor alone number 349, about $\frac{1}{3}$ of which are employed by Cic., including many common words (censor, imperator, senator) that permeate all grades of Latin. On the other hand, there are 47 (including 37 apparently ἀπαξίσιρ.) that are unknown in literature.

As regards meaning, the greater number of inscriptional words in—tor,—sor denote trades, or occupations (especially in the public service). In the language of commerce they strove for popular favor with the similar substt. in—arius (cf. infra § 16), but the latter, as the longer form, prevailed, and the inscr. show few doublets in form and meaning. (Cf. balneator,—arius, candidator,—arius; but actor = 'agent', 'steward', actarius = 'amanuensis'). The substantives in—tor,—sor belonged notably to the sermo castrensis (acneator, campidoctor, delectator, dextrator) and s. circensis (agitator, desultor, provocator, spartor).

The list below is a very representative one, showing that the suffix was a favorite in the Sermo Vulgaris. The substantives are used with equal freedom of general or particular actions (cf. adscriptor, adventor, defector, meator, subscriber); and are formed often from substantives, where there is no need of assuming an original verb. (cf. aeneator, aerumnator, balneator, fistulator, merulator). Spontaneous derivatives from the Greek show the influence of the foreign population. (Impaestator from ἐμπαστικός, dropacator — δρωπακιστής). Quite anomalous is the use of acceptator = porta, denoting a thing instead of a person. Cf. Engl. ‘receiver’ = ‘one who receives’ and ‘that which receives’ (as, of water, a ‘tank’ or ‘drain’).

It remains to mention the tendency of the Sermo Vulgaris to substitute the present participle for the nomen agentis in -tor, -sor; ¹ cognoscens = cognitor, commeans = viator or mercator, negotians = negotiator, provocans = provocator, vians = viator. This usage is still in evidence in the Romance languages. (Cf. amante beside amatore; negoziante, négociant; mercante, marchand = * mercans).

§ II. T-RIX. The popular character of the nomina personalia in -TRIX is too well known to deserve more than a passing mention. They abound in all the sources of the colloquial vocabulary, (Plaut.,⁴ Pliny, Mart., Apul., and the Church Fathers⁵), and are relatively rare in the writers of a more careful style. It is evident that the Sermo Vulgaris was unrestricted in the formation of these words. The inscr. show a decided predilection for them. Cf. the absurd hexameter verse:

⁵ Tert. has 48 new forms (Schmidt, Tert. p. 12 sq.); Hier. has altogether 26 (Paucker, Hier. p. 29); 'amat Augustinus nomina verba in -TOR (-SOR) et RIX --' (Paucker, Spicileg. p. 134, note 26).

SATRIX, SERVATRIX, AMATRIX, SACRIFICATRIX

from a dedication to Venus at Cumae.¹ Of the 57 words in the list below, 16 are not found elsewhere. Like the corresponding masculines in -TOR, -SOR, (cf. sodales ballatores, sutor institor, ‘merchant tailor’), they are freely used as adjectives, as in Edict. Dioclet., ‘the grinding I^{l.} tax’ (laceratrices centesimae), ‘ambushed audacity’ (*insidiatrix audacia*²).

In connection with the Romance languages, it is interesting to note the geographical distribution of the words. They are preserved in full vigor only in Ital.;³ while Fr., Span., Port., Prov. show them only in isolated instances. Omitting from the inscr. the very common and classical words adiutrix, genetrix, meretrix, nutrix, servatrix, victrix, 38, or exactly 2½% of the forms, are found only in Italy (with Rome),⁴ and these include with one exception, all the purely inscriptional words. Africa, which has left no modern derived language, has 8, a goodly proportion. Britain, in a single inscr. has the unclassical conditrix and the classical inventrix; but the inscr. of Britain are largely military, and represent, in general, the language as spoken elsewhere. On the other hand, Spain has only venatrix (class.); and Gaul, ornatrix (class. poet.). It may be assumed, therefore, that the phenomena of the Romance languages had their beginning far back in the Latin speech.

§ 12.—MEN. The relative position of —men and —mentum in the popular speech is still by no means clear, and the inscr. unfortunately afford little information bearing upon the subject. The literary evidence is summed up by Cooper,¹ without, however, bringing the subject to a satisfactory conclusion. “ From the foregoing statistics,” he says, “ it seems clear that Stuenkel was wrong in assigning —men to the list of vulgar Latin suffixes, and that on the contrary —mentum, like other heavy terminations, was the favorite in the sermo plebeius. ” There can be no doubt, certainly, that —men was the more prevalent in poetry; but this may be easily explained, at least for the dactylic verse, by the readiness with which dactyls may be formed with the various case-endings in —men, while those in —mentum are adapted only to spondees. It is mainly due to this fact that —men is so conspicuously prevalent in Lucretius²; and for this reason, in general, little importance can be attached to differences in poetic diction.³ If the longer forms were often preferred by less strict writers, if they grew in number during the periods of African and later Latinity, so too the shorter forms in —men never lost their formative activity, and in the latest times, as in the Hisperica Famina (6th or 7th cent.), they still hold a prominent place. (cf. altercamen, cibamen, congelamen, etc.⁴). If there was any significant choice of suffix in the later period, all that can be said is that —men tended to be used for concrete substantives, and —mentum to become abstract; and this gradual differentiation unquestionably arose out of the earlier sermo vulgaris.⁵

As to the inscr., the evidence is meager, but sustains, as far as it goes, the facts adduced above. There are 53 substt. in —men, and 55 in —mentum. Those in —men, however, show 5 forms that are found only in inscr., viz. nemen, proflamen,

² Cf. Munro, Lucr. II, note on I 435: augmine, a word of ten used by Lucr. and only by him and his constant imitator Arnobius; So VI 614 adaugmen: momen too seems peculiar to him and his imitators. for momentum: he also uses fragmina more than once: glomeramen, frustramen, vexamen, clinamen too he alone of classical writers employs.

³ Thus, one should not draw ready conclusions from the usage of Lucr. (—men) as compared with Varro's Sat. Men. (—mentum).

⁴ Cf. Geyer in ALL. II p. 261.

⁵ It is seen in the Romance langg. Cf. Ital. cognome, rame, fiume; fallimento, tramento.

recisamen, rutramen, superlimen; while in — mentum I find only two, apparamentum and adornamentum. In dictamen, moreover, we have the earliest example, and solamina has an unusual signification. On the whole, the interest in the inscr. forms attaches largely to those in — men.

§. 14.-BULUM, -CULUM. But slight importance attaches to the following list, in relation to the sermo vulgaris. The number of these subst. in literature (inclusive of their parallel masc. and fem.) is comparatively small; Paucker² has counted 171, of which exactly $\frac{1}{3}$ are in -bulum, and $\frac{2}{3}$ in -culum. As -culum is the more frequent, so too it shows relatively the greater number of common and classical forms, while -bulum seems to have been more at home in the flexible popular speech. The list below has 34 words, 9 in -bulum, 25 in -culum.³ One only, paticabulum, is new.

§ 15. —INA. The inscr. are singularly deficient in adjectival substt. in —ina denoting source or material, (especially flesh, as porcina, *agnina*¹), though the adj. themselves in —inus are not uncommon.² The list below includes those formed as well from substt. (disciplina, doctrina), as from verbs (lapicaedinae, ustrina); and in so far, offers nothing new or important. In one respect, however, this suffix is of unusual interest. Did. —inus, —ina have a diminutive force in Latin, as we should be led to expect by an a posteriori deduction from the romance languages? It certainly had no such force in the classic speech, and the romance scholars in general allude merely to the later trend in this direction.³ But there can be no doubt, it seems, that such a use was not unknown in the popular language, even in the earlier period. In the home-life, the diminutive is inseparably connected with kinship, and the multitude of such name-ratios as Faustus : Faustulus : Faustinus, Secunda : Secundilla : Secundina, (cf. Ital. naso : nasello : nasino), shows how early, at least in feeling, a similarity of sense had developed between the real diminutive —ulus, —illus, and the pseudo -diminutive —inus.

Nor are we entirely without instances of such a use of the suffix. Paucker⁴ cites from Not. Tiron. geminus, gemellus, gemininus and later instances could be gathered from the glosses.⁵ The inscr. show other forms; not certain, it is true, but bearing with probability on the point in question. Such are domnina (Ital. donnina) in a Spanish inscr., puerina pucina (Cf. Ital. picina) in a Chr. inscr. of Rome, and possibly pusina in the same sense in a graffito of Pompeii.⁶ It is possible also that buccina,

C. ADJECTIVES AND DERIVED SUBSTANTIVES.

The positive distinction between adj. and subst. is little maintained in popular Latin. It has been noted above in the lists §§ 10, 11 how the substt. in-tor-trix may be used adjectively (Cf. sutor institor, virgo deceptrix). This usage is common enough with certain words, even in the best literature.⁴ Such words, however, when forced into the position of adjective, still remain essentially substantives, and are so regarded. The same applies to certain classes of adjectives, as those in -bilis, -osus, -eus; they do not cease to be simple adjectives, even when temporarily raised to an independent standing. But there are other classes that lend themselves so naturally to the substantival use, that they may be considered as much the one as the other. As examples in point, -alis and -arius are properly adjectival terminations; but many words in -alis (cf. aequalis, augustalis, sex-fascialis, sodalis) are treated as real substt., and in the case of

³ Inscr. only.

⁴ Cf. Th. Vogel in N. Jahrb. für Philol., Vol. 127 (1883) p. 186: “wörter wie ARTIFEX, GLADIATOR, TIRO, VICTRIX, schon Cicero, solche wie ADVENA, DOMITOR, TRANSFUGA, auch Livius, und ADVENA, ANUS, DOMITOR, VICTOR, VIRGO u. a. auch Curtius adjektivisch gebraucht hat.”

-arius there is absolutely no distinction, (cf. a corpus corariorum magnariorum solatariorum, ‘wholesale sole-leather-workers’ union; s. solarius, ‘maker of soles.’), and in fact the substt. in -arius in the inscr. outnumber the adjj. by more than two to one.

This usage extends furthermore to the formation,* quite unlimited in the popular language, of a vast number of feminine and neuter derivatives as substt., often without any thought of a modified noun. In sense, they are simple substt.; but for comparative study as words they should be kept in relation with the adjectival terminations with which they belong. Accordingly, I have arranged the following lists with this scope in view, following the adjj. of each class (and connected masculine substt.) with the kindred feminines and neuters. How much information they may afford us of the tendencies of the Sermo Vulgaris in the matter of word-formation is shown by the fact that the section includes no less than 340 purely inscriptive words, and upwards, of 100 others in a sense not found in literature.

§ 16. -ARIUS. The words in -arius, -aria, -arium, form for several reasons the most interesting class included in the present study, and deserve a separate and thorough examination as a part of the popular vocabulary; but space will permit of only a brief consideration of their place in the Sermo Vulgaris. I shall confine myself, therefore, to a few deductions from the inscriptions, leaving the lists that follow to speak for themselves.

The total number of these words in inscr., at the present count, is 535 (-arius 412, -aria 43, -arium 80). This in itself speaks much for the popular character of the suffix. Two phases of ancient life are vitally brought down to us through these words; the daily labor (free or slave) and the military life. If language is a reflex of the life of a people, then here especially, where the daily life is shown, we should expect to find a strong drift of the popular vocabulary. And in fact, the number of new forms and meanings in the inscr.¹ shows most clearly that the sermo vulgaris availed itself of these suffixes to form new words at will. Augustus' predilection for Corinthian bronzes led to his being nicknamed ‘corinthiarius’ by a wit of the day,²

a word that is found elsewhere only in inscr. The same vitality attaches to the suffix in the Romance languages, most notably in Ital. with its erbwörter in -ajo, -aro,¹ -iero,² and its lohnwörter in -ario. The suffix still forms new words whenever the need is felt, even in jest, a sure test of its popularity and usefulness.³

By far the greater number of words in —arius relate to production and trade. A complicated industrial system requires a special terminology, and the choice of the suffix —arius in Latin, as referring to commercial affairs, both satisfied the need and furnished the language with an inexhaustible source of new words. The combinations of ideas caused by the association of men in industry are expressed in English by a succession of compounded substantives, as ‘wholesale wine and liquor dealer,’ ‘tin and sheet-iron workers.’ In Latin, the clumsy use of the genitive is avoided by the formation of any needed adj. in —arius; faber lectarius, gemmarius sculptor, *negotians*⁴ materiarius, negotiator gladiarius, redemptor marmorarius, instead of faber lectorum, gemmarum sculptor, etc. This is not due to a mere fondness for longer words; it fills a real want in the language. These words may be coupled to any length, and are always self-explanatory. Cf. navicularius lignarius, saccarius salarius, vestiarius tenuarius (qui facit vestes tenues), faber solearius baxarius, corpus mensorum frumentariorum nauticariorum. This commercial use of —arius being established, the formations are extended to adjj. derived from adjj. A ‘baker of white bread,’ (pistor panis candidi), is called pistor candidarius, a ‘keeper of a private bath,’ (qui balneum privatum exercet), is balneator privatarius.⁵ A further, and especially interesting, extension of use is seen in the derivatives of adjj. denoting nationality. Negotiatores parthici would be ‘Parthian traders,’ but ‘dealers in Parthian goods’ is most clearly distinguished by the simple expression negotiatores

² For Fr. -IER, Ital. -IERO, Span. -ERO, etc. = *-ERIUS or *-IARIUS, cf. Gröber, ALL. I p. 225, Thurneysen, ib. IV p. 155. The romance derivatives from -ARIUS have been recently treated in a monograph by Zimmerman.

³ On the appearance of a vendor of stewed pears, I have heard the spontaneous formation, as a jest, “ecco il perecotto!”

⁵ BALNEATOR PRIVATUS would give quite a different meaning.

*parthicarii.*¹ The inscr. furnish us three words of this sort, all ἀπαξ εἰρημένα, which appear almost to have escaped notice. In c. VI 1620 (Rome), we have mercatares frumentari et oleari afrari, 'dealers in African grains and oils'; in c. VI 9676 (Rome): negotians salsamentarius et vinariarius maurarius, 'importer of salt-meats and wines from Mauretania.' Both of these merchants were presumably Roman citizens, and neither need have been of African origin; so the words afer and maurus could not have been used, and would have carried a totally different meaning. These two instances serve to explain the third, regarding which the commentators have needlessly troubled themselves. In c. XII 3349 (Nemausus), we have mention of a venaliciarius graecarius. This latter word is not a mis-spelling of gregarius, as Mommsen proposed, not noting the above parallels. The merchant in question was not a 'wholesale slave-dealer,' nor even a Greek dealer in slaves (venaliciarius graecus, through he may, of course, have been a Greek); but a dealer who made a specialty of Greek slaves. An examination of the list below will show conclusively that a dealer in venalicia graeca would be known as *venaliciarius graecarius.*²

The double suffix —(i)ari-arius appears in inscr. (often beside the simple suffix) in the following words: capsararius, oculararius, odariarius, pugillariarius, salariarius, sigillariarius, speculararius vinariarius. All but one are found only in inscr.; salariarius occurs also in the Digest. They are properly secondary derivatives; salariarius (salarium), pugillariarius (pugillares), odariarius (odaria = carmina)³; but the original subst. of many do not occur, and they may have been formed merely for the sake of greater length.⁴ We may also assume, however, originals of a more general signification; vinarii; sigillarii are 'dealers in vinum', 'makers of sigilla'; vinarii, sigillarii are 'dealers in wines etc' (vinaria*), 'makers of figurines and the like' (sigillaria*).

³ So Petron.

⁴ Cf. Fr. boucher = Engl. butcher, but Fr. fruit-iére = Engl. fruit-er-er; Ital. calderajo = *CALDARARIUS.

As instances of the substitution of -arius for other suffixes, we may note argentarius, aurarius (= argenteus, aureus), pedarius (= pedalis). A pure instance of the popular fondness for long words occurs in pedisequarius=pedisequus. The grammatical distinction between—arius and—aris and its neglect in inscr. will be treated below § 19.

It remains only to speak of the formation of diminutives from -arius in the sermo vulgaris. That such diminutives must have been prevalent is shown by the Romance languages, esp. Ital., where they are very numerous. Cf. barcajuolo (* barcariolus), borsajuolo (* bursariolus), fruttajuolo (* fructariolus), always with a shifting of accent. The inscr. have only one example, *pomariolum*¹, but the following words, taken at random, attest the usage in Latin:

ANCILLARIOLUS. Mart. XII 58.

CELLARIOLUM = CELLULA, Hier. adv. Jovin. 2. 29.

CERVARIOLUS. Schol. Bern. Verg. Ecl. 8. 3.

CIBARIOLUS. C. G. L. III p. 254. 37.

§ 19. — ARIS. Closely connected with the adj.-subst. in —arius in Latin are those in —aris. The distinction in usage is thus explained by the grammarian Charisius: ⁶ ‘cubicularius est custos cubiculi, cubicularis vero lectus cubiculo aptus, ut caligarius artifex, caligaris clavus, ----- et cellarius servus, turdus cellularis, et balnearius fur, balnearis autem urceus et solea balnearis.’ That is to say, -arius refers properly to the occupation of a person, -aris to the use to which a thing is applied. That such a distinction, useful as it may have been, was little regarded in the popular speech, may be readily inferred; that it existed, however, in all forms of the language, is equally plain. In the inscr., we have consistently solearius (faber) and solearis (cella),

³ Cic. ep.

⁴ Suet., Pliny, Ulp., Javol.

⁵ Lampr., Ulp., Veget.

⁶ Gramm. Lat. p. 76-7 (ed. Keil.).

tabularius (of occupation) and tabularis (aes). The distinction reduced to a grammatical rule by Charisius, remained in vigor, even if it found ready exceptions in the popular speech. Judging by the inscr., — and their evidence is no less than supported by unclassical literature, — the tendency to trespass was rather in the direction of -aris.¹ This is especially the case in the military language, where -aris is readily forced into the position of -arius. (alaris decurio, auxiliaris miles, commanipularis, conalaris, s. sc. miles, peculiaris Strator, vicensumarius duumvir). The interchange of the two suffixes may be seen in the following summary, in which the first column contains instances in which, by Charisius' rule, -arius should be used; the second, instances where -aris is preferable. It will be observed that the rule is as often disregarded as regarded.

Alarius (miles, eques, cohors etc.), alaris (de- curio).	alaris (exercitatio).
Albarius (tector.)	albarius , albaris (opus).
Auxiliarius , auxiliaris (miles).
Balnearis (Fortuna)	balnearius (instrumentum).
Caligarius (sutor, artifex)	caligarius , caligaris (clavus).
Commanipularius — aris (miles).
Conalaris (miles).
Dolarius (officina ²)	doliaris (opus).
Frumentarius (miles).
Peculiarius — aris (stra- tor.)	peculiaris (fornax, furnus, ratio).
Scholarius (deus)	scholaris (otium).
Solearius (faber.)	solearis (cella).
Tutelarius — aris (praetor).
Vicensumarius — aris (du- umvir).

² Here placed as = officina doliariorum.

The relation of -aris and -alis is noticed below, § 32. Of the 50 words in the list below, 15 are confined to inscr.

§ 20. -ARE, -AR. The comparison of the -ar- suffixes would be incomplete without including the substt. in -ar and -are, which have the same relation to the adj. in -aris, that those in -ale bear to -alis. They almost all refer to objects and utensils, generally simple things of common life. Of the two suffixes, -ar is the more classical; I should unhesitatingly assign -are, however, to the sermo vulgaris, especially where it is used for the more frequent -arium, (cf. columbare, itinerare, nubilare.) From the inscr. I have collected 21 words, 7 in -ar, 14 in -are. Of those in -ar, 4 are found in classic writers, and 2 in the post-classical literature, (lucar Tac., Tert.; altar Prudent. etc.), while the one remaining, columnar, is $\ddot{\alpha}\pi\alpha\xi\ \varepsilon\iota\varphi$, and may be an abbreviation of columnar(ium), though I think not. In -are, on the other hand, we have only collare (Plaut., Lucil., Varro) and luminare (Cic. ep.), with 5 post-classical forms; beside 7, or the exact half, that belong wholly to inscr.

§ 21. -t-orius, -s-orius. The prevailing opinion that these adjj. and the corresponding substt. belong especially to the sermo vulgaris, and principally to that of the post-classical period,¹ is confirmed by all the facts. They are rare in the earliest period, and their number is limited in the classical authors, while they find their readiest use in Pliny, and in the African writers beginning with Tertullian.² Their preponderance in Pliny is partly due to the fact that they formed so many technical terms in medicine³ and allied subjects. In Tertullian and his African successors, the words have no such technical sense, but must be regarded as a part of the popular vocabulary of the period that found its way into literature more readily in Africa than elsewhere.

The time has not yet arrived to speak dogmatically of local variations in Latin, but in view of the evidence afforded by literature, it will not be out of place to note that the Africitas of this suffix receives some support also from inscrs.⁴ Aratorius appears in two African inscrs. of the time of Commodus, and in literature first in the Code of Theodosius; exceptorium in the Latin version of the book of Sirach, for which Thielmann⁵ claims an African origin, and in an inscr. of Numidia; susceptorium, in the same sense, in an inscr. of the proconsular province. Without going into details, the following lists show more than the usual proportion of citations from African sources. Spain, too, is well represented; a fact that should be noted in view of the opinion held by some scholars⁶ of a close relation between the sermo vulgaris of Africa and that of the Iberian peninsula. Adiutorium = adiumentum is most frequent in the African writers;⁷ it occurs in Spanish inscrs. of Norba and Aurgi. Inligatorium =

§ 23. -anus. The adjj. (and adj.-substt.) in -anus have received detailed treatment by Schnorr von Carolsfeld¹; I shall add, therefore, only a few remarks suggested by the list below, which contains 50 words, 17 of which are not found in literature.

A relatively numerous class is that of words compounded with prepositions, and representing a prepositional phrase. They belong without doubt to the sermo vulgaris, especially to the daily life of town and camp in Italy. Suburbanus alone is classical; a few others find their way into later literature,² but by far the greater number certainly never passed out of the spoken language. Such are anteportanus, infraforanus, subaedanus and subaedianus, subhortanus and the like. To the same language of town and camp, (from which they passed also into that of law), belong in great part the numerous substt. with con- in the sense of 'fellow-'³. With the present suffix there are four: companianus, consacranus, conveteranus (Cod. Just.), convicanus (Cod. Theod.). In consacranus, for -eus, pedanus for -arius, and classianus for -icus, we have pure popular formations. The essentially unliterary character of medianus, primanus, rusticanus, tertianus, venetiani has long been noted.

Parallel with the commercial use of arius in afrarius, maurarius etc.,⁴ is that in -anus of a secondary or tertiary derivation from place-names: britann-ic-ianus, gall-ic-anus, german-ic-ianus, ital-ic-ianus, urb-an-ic-ianus. These words are the joint property of the sermo castrensis and the language of trade,¹ and are one of the many evidences of the close relationship of these two phases of the popular speech. Where the legions went, the traders followed, and the sermo vulgaris that developed from them readily merged the tendencies of each.

been noticed above § 15, and citations from the glosses are given, Introd. § 4. Pusina—‘little one’ apparently occurs in a Pompeian graffito, and a puerina pucina is mentioned in a Chr. inscr. of Rome (Ital. piccino, Spain. pequeño, Port. pequeno).

The commonest use of the suffix is to form adjj. from the names of animals, and these words are most frequent in popular, and especially rustic, Latin.¹ The inscr. have 16 such adjj., derived largely from the Edict of Diocletian de Pretiis Rerum Venalium, of which two are new, alcinus (alces) and melinus (meles). Parallel derivations from the vegetable world are of the highest rarity, but an Arval record of A. D. 87 has ramus ex arbore ilicina.

I have not hesitated to include also the adjj. with short i, derived from the Greek (-ιος); together with the pure Latin word galbinus (Petron., Mart., Vopisc.; s. Mart., Juv.), which bears the impress of the sermo vulgaris.

§ 25.—osus.¹ The greatest extention of the use of adjj. in-osus is in the sermo vulgaris; but the inscr. offer little of interest to sustain the evidence of literature.² I have collected 54 words, of which only 5 are new, while no less than 43, or $\frac{4}{5}$ of all, are found in classical prose and poetry. Their infrequency in inscr. is no disproof of their general use in the popular speech; it shows merely that the subject matter of inscr. is very limited, and warns us not to accept too readily their negative evidence. What little evidence there is, in fact, is positive enough. Six forms in-osus (including extaliosus, new) are found in the graffiti and dipinti of Pompeii, which represent, better than any other inscr., the sermo vulgaris of the time. And the ill-natured bone tesserae, so fond of -o, -onis used in malam partem,³ are equally given to-osus. (ebriose! stumacose! vinose!) The fondness for cognomina which this termination in Africa (cf. Iuliosa) is well known.⁴

If the inscr. are lacking in these adjj., the glosses have them in abundance. Though the glosses do not fall within my province, they are largely derived from the sources of popular Latin, and it will not be wholly out of place, where the inscr. offer such meager materials, to cite from the Glossae Latino-Graecae, the following words which are missing in G.

§ 26. -bilis. The interest of the inscriptional forms in -bilis in relation to the sermo vulgaris attaches especially to the words in which the real force of the suffix has been entirely lost. The graffiti of Pompeii have preserved to us a number of remarkable adverbs in -bilater, formed evidently for the sake of greater length, and used for the simple ablative of the gerund; ceventinabiliter, festinabiliter, inclinabiliter, irrumabiliter have no greater force than cevendo, festinando etc. This fondness for the long termination -bilater, as replacing the gerund or a mere adverb, is very old in Latin. The early writers³ admitted it readily from the sermo vulgaris, as Naev. exanimabiliter ‘as if half-dead’; Plaut. dissimulabiliter = dissimulanter; Cato imperabiliter = imperando; Acc. indecorabiliter = indecore; but it was quite rigorously excluded from the classic speech, and found little acceptance in literature⁴ until the late period⁵, when it was drawn again from the popular language, where it had evidently always lived on.

Beside the above-mentioned words, we have, also in a di pinto of Pompeii, the anomalous form fratrabiliter from a subst. stem, = fraterne; on the analogy of which I have hazarded the suggestion that the graffito ceventinabilit[r] a---rurabiliter may be supplied to read a[ut c]rurabiliter, which I leave to the judgment of critics.

Whether in the above indications we may see a special development of the Campanian, or South Italian, sermo vulgaris, it is impossible to say. The fact may be noted, however, that another unusual word in -bilis, in an active sense, appears in the neighboring Volscian-Latin town of Aquinum: statua perpetuabilis = qui memoriam perpetuat.

§. 28. -CEUS, -CIUS. With these adj., and their corresponding substt. (masc., fem., and neut.), we are once more in the field of the inscriptional sermo vulgaris. Of the 51 words gathered from inscr., no less than 20, or about 40 %, are not found elsewhere. The adj. in -ICIUS were collected by Paucker¹ to the number of 131, and later by Wölfflin,² who, with a wider range of sources, raised the number to 219. From the inscr. I am able to add 6 to his list: auraticius, collacticius, deducticius, genialicius, vernacius, parentalicius; and must extract one, for his centurionicus should certainly be transferred to -ICUS. A number of hitherto unrecorded substt. in -ICIUM, and one in -ICIA, will also be found below.

In the official language, aedilicius (aedil-is) and tribunicius (tribun-us) are in classical use, but the analogous words from substt. in -tor are certainly vulgar. The grammarian Caper³ says: ‘ vir praetorius et quaestorius, non praetoricius aut quaestoricius dicendum. ’ Praetoricius occurs only in Martial; quaestoricius nowhere in literature; both, however, are frequent in inscr., which have also curatoricius, as well as cerealicius, duumviralicus, quinquennalicius from substt. in -alis, all certainly fruits of the municipal sermo vulgaris. In the words denoting personal and family relations, the suffix -cius plays a part also in the sermo vulgaris. Collacticius appears beside -eus and -aneus; nutricius beside nutritor; nepoticius = neptis; vernacius = verna. The last two show a shifting of meaning of the -ac, -ic- suffixes that ended in the diminutive -ico of Spanish, and the -iccio, -accio, -uccio of Italian. The same may be seen in sodalicius = sodalis, with the fondness for long words that appears in auraticius = auratus.

§ 29. -icus. These adj. stand so close to those in -icius that both forms often exist side by side as doublets.² As a whole they have not yet been collected,³ but they appear to be less numerous than the forms in -icius, and, in general, more classical. Of the simple words in -icus (-icum, -ica), the inscr. give 35 examples, all from adj. and noun stems except medicus, medica (medeor) and triticum (tero). Those formed from stems of the first declension by the aid of an epenthetic *T*⁴ (avia-t-icus, herba-t-icus, multa-t-icus, via-t-icum), and further extended to -o-, -u- and consonantal stems, are much less numerous, and doubtless belong largely to the sermo vulgaris. Paucker⁵ has counted only 49, vett. 18, recc. 31; and herbaticus should be added to his list. Quite anomalous, though frequent and classical, is domes-t-icus (for domus-t-icus*), to the analogy of which, perhaps, we owe the form rus-t-icus, where we should expect rur-icus*. (cf. ruralis).

The inscr. add 7 words in -icus to our dictionaries; including centurionicus, which I place here⁶ on the analogy of mangonicus, mulionicus; and in the case of several others we have the earliest instance. Forms in -icus with long i are not included in the list; the inscr. have only amicus, amica, apricus (c. III 188), inimicus, lorica (c. V 6428, 7349; IX 6257; III 2072), and pudicus. I have admitted, however, two Greek words, coroliticus, memphiticus, which properly do not belong here.

§ 31. —Ivus,¹ (—iva, —ivum). Cooper, following Guericke² and Schulze,³ has placed this suffix among those most prevalent in the sermo vulgaris. The inscr., with only 23 words, show so much that is new in form and meaning, as to give additional evidence of the fact. But it seems to be especially in the formation of substt. in —ivum, —iva that the sermo vulgaris is to be discerned. In literature, conditivum = sepulcrum is found only in Seneca; but it appears several times in inscr. of Ostia, once in Spain. Subsicivum as a technical term occurs in Varro, Suet., and gromat. vet., and in an inscr. of Falerio; ambulativa = ‘promenade’ is ἀπαξ εἰρ.; comitiva is found in late literature; praerogativa is early admitted by Livy from the language of law and politics. Cicero and Caesar have none of them. Almost half of the words in the list below are substt..

§ 32. — Alis. In his lists of popular Latin suffixes, Cooper has omitted—alis, it is not evident for what reason, for it is certain that no class of words was more readily formed in the sermo vulgaris; and the suffix is still active in the romance languages, (Ital.-ale, Span.-al, Prov.-al, au, Fr.-al, -el). Paucker³ has collected 84 words in-alis and 6 in-al(e) which appear first in silver Latin; Rönsch⁴ gives 6 forms from the Latin versions of the Bible, and 41 new forms from later literature, including Tert. 10, Cael. chron. 5, Script. Hist. Aug. and Amm., 3, the jurists 9. I am unable to say how frequent they are in the pre-classical writers, but may note the Plautine words emortalis (Pseud. 1237) and exanimalis (Rud. 221, Bacch. 848).

The inscr. prove conclusively how prevalent-alis was in the popular language. They have 158 words,—a relatively large number, as comparison with the other lists will show; and of these, 26 are not found in literature (19 of them apparent ἀπαξεῖσιον). This does not include the substt. in-al(e), which further add 3 inscriptional forms out of 17. Kübler⁵ has noticed the numerous words in-alis in the inscr. of Africa, citing 14 forms, to which several can be added from the list below. We cannot assume, however, that-alis enjoyed an especial popularity in Africa. If we consider the words that are known only from inscr., we find the following geographical distribution: Rome and vicinity 10, Danubian provinces 8, Africa 5, S. Italy 4, N. Italy 3, Spain, 1, Gaul 1.

² Varro., Suet., gromat. vet.

³ Silb. Lat. p. 21 sq.

⁴ p. 118 sq.

⁵ ALL. VIII p. 169.

The words in -alis may be roughly classed as (A) derived from subst., (B) derived from adjj. The former were often in common use, but the popular mind undoubtedly formed them from any subst. at will. (cf. ambrostalis, aurigalis, pratalis.) Masculines denoting things for the usual neuter in -al(e) are also popular formations. (frontalis, toralis). The greatest extension is seen in the official terminology of the municipia, where -alis as subst. denotes the honorary rank of a person, or the office formerly held by him; very many such subst. appear only in inscr. And such clumsy combinations as quinqueduumviralis, septemsemiodialis are part and parcel of the pompous provincialism which sees dignity in ‘sesquipedalian words.’¹

Of (B), words derived from adjj., the majority are due to the same fondness for overloaded terminations, are mere extensions of simple adjj. with no added force whatever. Cic. has aequalis and inaequalis, but the meaning differs from that of aequus, iniquus. The inscr. are full of these adjj.: aeternalis, amicalis, annualis, aestivalis, divalis, infernalis, laticlavialis, perpetualis, semiperternalis, vicinalis, and the subst. urnalis — urna, not one of which occurs in Cic., Caes., or the classical poets. They are fruits of the sermo vulgaris at all periods, from which many of them are taken into literature by the later and less exacting writers.

The sister suffixes -alis and -aris are used absolutely alike. The phonetic principle that governed their selection and produced singul-aris and plur-alis is succinctly stated in its extreme grammatical form by Pliny, as cited by Charisius:² “Laterale an laterare? Ubi Plinius eodem libro VI: ‘si r littera praecesserit in quacumque syllaba, sequi debet l, ut angurale. Contra si l praecesserit, sequi debet r, ut molare’”. No grammatical rule is strictly maintained outside of classical Latin. In Pannonia and Noricum, Jupiter the Mountain-thunderer was worshiped irrespectively under the names culminaris and culminalis, as we learn from inscriptions.

While the adj. in —eus permeate all phases of the Latin language, and are especially frequent in classical poetry, it seems worth while to collect the forms that appear in inscr., if only to show to what extent the poetical and the popular language adopt the same terminology. The large number of words in inscr. that are, in literature, distinctive of, or noticeable in, classical poetry, proves the closeness of the relation. Beyond this there is not much to be said of the inscr. Of the 77 words below, 6 are new; others show the earliest use, as buxeus, A. U. C. 631-2 (Varro); acerneus, 1st (Venant. ep.); altilaneus, 183 (Serv. Aen.). Forms in — aneus are generally unclassical¹; the inscr.

§ 34. -ATUS. All scholars are agreed in assigning to the sermo vulgaris an unlimited power of forming participial adjj. at will, without the concurrence of the corresponding verb.⁵ Such adjj. have been noted especially in the early comedians, in Petronius. and in later literature. Their generally ‘popular’ character is too evident to require further demonstration, but the inscr. also offer evidence where none is needed. Of the 73 words below, 16. or 22 o/o, are not found anywhere in literature, judging by the lexicons. In many cases the adj. was in existence long before the denom. verb was formed from the same stem. Not to go beyond inscr., the following instances may be noted.

Angulatus (1 st)	Angulare (Ambros.)
Clatratus (Plaut.),	Clatrare (Col.)
Effrenatus (Cic.)	Effrenare (Sil.)
Inargentatus (Pliny),	Inargentare (Paul. Sent.)
Marmoratus (Varro),	Marmorare (Lampr.)

Others are formed directly from the subst., not from the co-existent verb, as the meaning clearly shows. Cf. corporatus (corpus), equitatus (eques), both in a sense peculiar to inscr. Rönsch (p. 473) has cited from the Itala a number of adj. from substt. in -or; in a remarkable epitaph from Rome, we have the new form amoratus = amans, which again exhibits the popular fondness for long words, as do also the inscriptional annuculatus, bimatus (= annuculus, bimus); prasiatus = prasinus (as albatus, russatus); absidata = absis; sterata (στερεός) = terra.

D. DIMINUTIVES.

Of the position of Latin diminutives in general, and their place in the sermo vulgaris,⁴ it is unnecessary to speak, for no class of words has received more attention, or has had its status more firmly established.⁵ Space admits only a brief consideration of their use in inscriptions, from which I have collected 168 words, about 13 % of which are not found in literature. But the list below does not exhaust our evidence, as regards inscriptions, of the use of diminutives in popular Latin; they form the stem of very many words in the preceding lists, notably those in—arius. Cf. medicus auricul-arius,⁶ canalicul-arius, castell-anus, ceriol-arium (* cereolum), hortolanus, (Ital. Ortolano), lenuncul-arius (lenunculus—lembunculus), navicul-arius, quadrigul-arius, stabellarius (* stabellum), utricul-arius: etc.

⁶ This word very early lost all dim. force, as here, and has supplanted AURIS in the modern languages.

A very large part of the inscriptive diminutives is found in epitaphs, and these express affection, either (1) in the family relations,¹ or (2), as an extension of the above, in anything connected with death or the tomb. In the popular mind, the memory of the beloved dead imparted a sort of tender feeling to their final resting-place, which found its readiest expression in the use of diminutives.² To the same feeling of affection is due the use of words like auricula, brachiolum, labellum, ocellus, and, as extended to every object of daily and personal contact, we have the names of domestic animals, asellus, capella, catella, ovicula, porcellus, the farm, its buildings and accessories, agellus, arbuscula, capistellum, castaniola, casula, coliculus, faseolus (Ital. fagioli), fiscella, hortulus, lenticula, saliuncula, stupulae, viniola, and the like.

The graffiti and dipinti of Pompeii, a sure source of the plebeian vocabulary, furnish about $\frac{1}{10}$ of all the inscriptive diminutives. There are but few forms from adjectives: aenulus, blandulus, dolentulus, misellus, ovillus, parvulus. quantuluscumque; and but one double-diminutive, agellulus. Instances of change of gender³ are more noteworthy: calliculus (callum), porticulus, hic praetoriolus, principiola (principium = aditus?), hic saxulus, centunculum, statunculum. The very irregularity of these formations shows the popular character of diminutives; still, the mastering feature of the sermo vulgaris is not so much their irregularity in form and meaning as the spontaneity of their use. In very many cases they undoubtedly conserve a real diminutive signification, or the allied one of affection.⁴

Words in —unculus (whether regularly formed from stems in —on— or not) are placed separately at the end.

⁴ In c. III 4185, HORTUS and HORTULUS are both used, and correctly, according to the point of view; when, however, a sorrowing father describes himself as DOLEN-TULUS UNA CUM MATRE (VIII 9969) he certainly has lost all sense of the force of the termination.

VITA.

Brooklynii, quae urbs nunc Novi Eboraci in eiusdem nominis civitate pars est facta, ante diem XIII Kalendas Octobres anno Domini MDCCCLXVIII natus sum, patre Georgio, matre Ioanna, quibus ambobus adhuc videntibus maxime gaudeo. Litterarum elementa in instituto urbis meae Polytechnico persecutus sum. Studiis variis, mihi hercule semper ingratis imbutum me ad vitam commercii applicatum voluerunt; sed etiam vitae ineuntis annis doctrinae antiquitatis classicae imprimis archaeologicae nec non artis numismaticae addictus, ad studia latina et graeca Universitatis Columbiae Novi Eboraci perducenda me contuli, ubi anno MDCCCLCIII ad gradum Baccalaurei in Artibus admissus sum. Tres postea annos, alumnus et socius Universitatis, studia illa litteraria et philologica perduxi, et lectiones audivi virorum illustrissimorum et mihi nunc et semper venerandorum Peck, Merriam, Perry, Egbert, Jackson aliorum, quibus omnibus—nisi quod doctissimus Merriam morte improvisa nobis et Universitati ereptus est — gratias nunc publice agere placet. Duos autem annos sequentes, primum ab ipsa Universitate, deinde ab Instituto Archaeologico Americano socius Scholae Studiorum Classicorum Americanae Roman missus, rebus maxime topographicis, epigraphicis, numismaticis me applicui, sub cura doctorum Warren, Smith, Marquand, Norton nostrorum, Huelsen, Mau, E. Stevenson, E. Loewy, Marucchi, Lanciani ibi consistentium.
